MHS Teacher Lives Happily Ever After: Mr. Hale's Marriage at King Richard's Faire

By LEO WALDBAUM

If you and your spouse can agree to tie the knot at a Renaissance faire, it is likely a good sign for your marriage. On Saturday, October 5, Robert Hale, an English teacher at MHS, did exactly that, using King Richard's Faire as the venue for what he described as "a literal Fairy Tale wedding."

Hale and his wife, Haley Mazzarella, have been going to King Richard's Faire for years. After they got engaged, Hale and Mazzarella knew they wanted their wedding to "tell a story."

Hale, eager to indulge his inner English teacher's love for Shakespearean tropes, chose to have their wedding there. This decision ultimately led him to stand on stage, dressed as a knight in shining armor with a large sword.

But while Hale and his wife were on stage, most of the crowd didn't realize it was an actual wedding, believing it to be another one of the various shows across the faire. One man in the back was on a loud phone call during the ceremony. Eventually, I piped up to let him know it was a real wedding and he immediately left.

curred when Mazzarella arrived late to the grand procession around the faire, which was led by King Richard and the Queen with their royal entourage. Hale was marching alone, prompting people to ask him, "Where is your wife?" to which he jokingly replied, "Honestly, I'm surprised she lasted that long."

Mazzarella joined him after she grabbed her new bow, which seems to be a very fitting reason to be late at a Renaissance faire.

Even though the wedding setting was fantastical—filled with the sound of bagpipes and cheers of "Huzzah!"—the emotions shared by the couple's friends and family were genuine. Hale explained, "The people who were invited were the people I knew who would love it."

While their wedding might not be for everyone, it was exactly what they wanted. And hopefully their fairytale wedding will end with a happily ever after.

All-New AI Day

By AIDAN LESCHUK

Nearly two years ago, tech startup OpenAI launched the now-infamous artificial intelligence program known as ChatGPT. Since then, GPT has only grown in popularity and capabilities, reshaping the world as we know it. Unsurprisingly, no setting has been impacted more than high school.

Almost immediately after ChatGPT became accessible worldwide, cases of cheating with the program began surfacing. Colleges—and soon after, high schools—began reporting students using the software to complete assignments in mere seconds. What followed was chaos: teachers scrambling to curb AI use, which, ironically, seemed to make it even more widespread. Here at Milton High, the ripple effect led to a new "AI Policy" added to this year's student handbook.

In today's high school environment, students can hardly go a day without hearing about AI. From stern warnings to dire promises, messages discouraging its use—especially for written work—seem to be everywhere. Yet, in a surprising twist, Milton High's most prominent advocate for artificial intelligence happens to be the director of its English department.

Cross Country Crosses the Finish Line

By LAYLA RAYMOND

It's loud—parents yelling to their kids, teams shouting chants, and some runners squeezing in last-minute strides. Then, the announcer's voice pierces through the noise, delivering instructions and rules on how the race will unfold.

With just three words, "On your marks," the atmosphere shifts. The boisterous energy vanishes, replaced by an electrifying silence that grips everyone. Then the gun goes off. In an instant, the commotion returns, and you find yourself running alongside them, not wanting to miss a second of the action.

On Monday November 11,

Milton High's Girls Cross Country team placed seventh with 197 points, earning a spot at the MIAA Meet of Champions Cross Country meet in Devens, Massachusetts. Although the boys' team did not qualify as a group, senior Joshua Toth qualified individually, placing 8th out of 155 runners with an impressive time of 16:46.81 in the 5k.

Riding high on their performances, the varsity runners turned their focus to the final meet the following Saturday, November 16.

For their final week of preparation, the girls and boys trained from Monday through Friday. When asked about their preparation, girls' varsity runner Fiona Tobin shared, "We did a lot of hill workouts and speed workouts as well as short runs around town to make sure we were prepared without being burnt out."

Coaches Jason Cakouros and George Daly led the boys' team, while Milton High's own teachers, Ms. Ritten, Mrs. Laugh-ton, and T Shaw coached the girls.

On race day, the runners packed into the bus at 8:15 am, joined by supportive friends and family. Among those in attendance was Milton High's Athletic Director, Michael Bierwirth, who cheered the team on.

Even if the runners were nervous, they didn't show it on their faces as they stepped off that bus with confidence. After setting up a tent and putting down their bags, the coaches and runners walked the course, examining its twists and turns.

Unlike other sports, cross country courses change with every meet, offering unpredictable terrain. This particular 5k featured wide-open stretches of field, up and down steep hills, and paths through the woods, where clouds of dirt obscured the runners' vision as they navigated the rugged terrain.

Representing Milton High was freshman Grace Danielson, sophomores Evelyn Toth and Reese Longo, juniors Lauren Cooper and Fiona Tobin, and seniors Megan Carew and Lydia Turner. Overall, the girls placed 22nd with 538 points. Danielson led the team with a time of 20:30.81.

Reflecting on the race, Coach Daly remarked, "This is the best competition I've seen all year. They ran strong. They ran tough. They weren't all feeling good so it's always impressive to see them out here."

As for Milton High's singular runner for the boys' team, Toth placed 58 out of 186 with a time of 17:00.51.

The end of the race mirrored the start—emotions running high as parents, friends, and coaches cheered their teams through the final meters. No matter how the runners fared mid-race, everything boiled down to those last few seconds. And just like the silence before the starting gun, the fierce intensity dissipated as runners crossed the finish line. Competitors comforted and congratulated one another. Some left with injuries, others with upset stomachs, and a lucky few headed for the merchandise stand.

Milton High's Cross Country runners left Devens content with their efforts. After a well-earned two-week break, most of these athletes will transition to their winter sports starting December 2nd. With new leadership from Lauren Cooper, Rebecca Domineau, and Fiona Tobin for the girls' team and Gideon Toth for the boys, Milton's runners are already setting their sights on next year, hoping for even faster times and stronger finishes in the seasons to come.

English department while teaching English I and Introduction to Law, takes a different approach. While many educators focus on AI's potential for misuse, Hardie acknowledges that "AI is a reality that's not going to go away," embracing its "beneficial and detrimental uses."

He especially emphasizes the importance of mastering AI as a workplace skill, noting that it's something employers increasingly expect.

This unique passion and perspective emerged from several factors. Hardie attributes his initial fascination towards AI to him simply having an interest in new technologies. Hardie's daughters have also brought the topic to his attention. He claims that their "employers expect them to be using it on a daily basis."

To make artificial intelligence more of an educational tool, Hardie has been participating in creating the high school's first-ever "AI day."

On the fifth of December, each class period will have an artificial intelligence-related lesson. The goal is to increase students' "exposure to aspects of AI they may not have thought of," and the half-day will educate students and teachers alike.

For example, Hardie's English I class will practice using AI for summary and research purposes, and his law class will discuss liability in scenarios of AI use in the medical field.

Many members of the MHS community may have concerns about the plan as a whole. While Hardie acknowledges that this risks allowing more students to cheat with AI, he also notes that a number of the classes will center around the ethics of artificial intelligence. He remains optimistic, predicting that "students will be receptive to hearing that AI has its beneficial uses."

On Tuesday, November 12, the girls' lacrosse team gathered in Cope-land Fieldhouse for an early pre-season meeting. Head Coach Elizabeth Lane Schaeffer announced that she would not be returning next season.

Lane Schaeffer, who has coached the girl's varsity lacrosse team at Milton High for almost a decade, has decided to leave the program. Lane Schaeffer and the team have faced many ups and downs during her tenure at Milton High School.

Last year, the team advanced to the first round of the Division 2 MIAA tournament, a goal Lane Schaeffer and the players set at their first practice.

When the players asked the coach why she had left, she explained that she had been offered a JV position at Norwell, the town where she works.

The decision didn't come easily to Lane Schaeffer. When asked how she felt about her choice, she stated it was an emotional and hard decision. She said, "I will really miss coaching you and the other players at Milton High School."

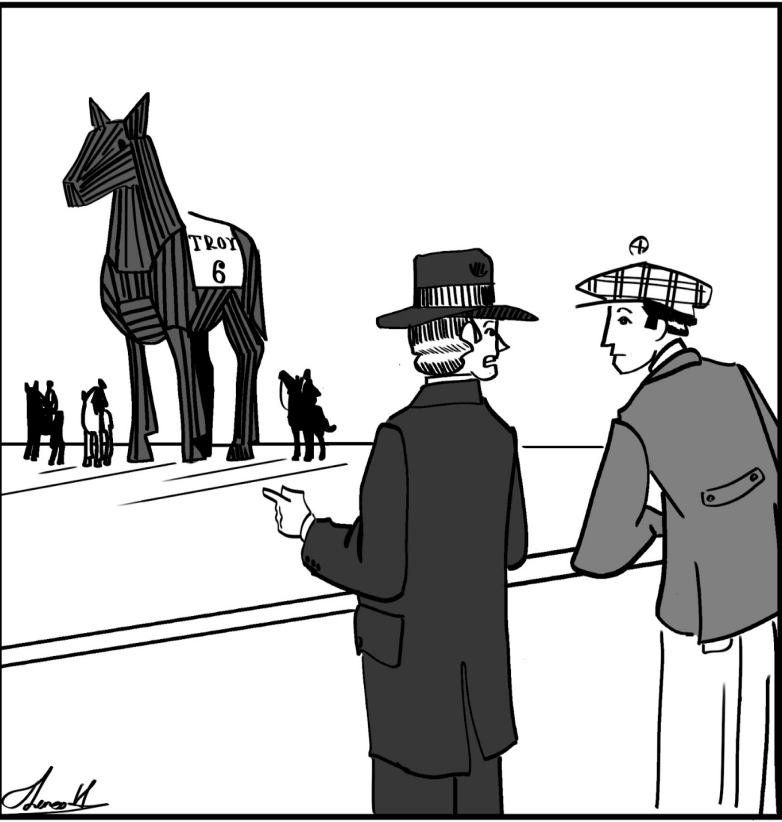

She has formed strong connections with every player, watching them grow as not only athletes but also as individuals.

The players share this feeling as well. Sophomore Georgia Trelinik stated, "Coach built the team into a sisterhood, a family. It's where I met new friends, and it's where I found my passion." She went on to say that Coach Lane Schaeffer "cares about every single one of us."

Junior Varsity coach Jackie Connors will also be parting ways with the program.

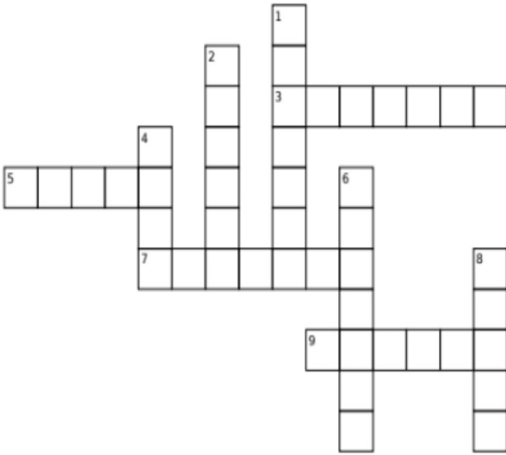

After a rough 4-14 season, the Wildcats look forward to the coming spring, when they can hope to rebuild the program and improve their record. While the hunt for the new coach begins, Lane Schaeffer has left the team in the good hands of senior captains Lucie Lloyd-Farber and Sophie McFadden.

"I bet on 6, I gotta feeling something big's comin' outta that one."
